Transforming Juvenile Justice Through Arts Education

How can arts education transform a state's juvenile justice dilemmas? Guest author Kelsey Giroux writes about this in our newest ArtsEd Amplified post, Transforming Wyoming's Juvenile Justice System: The Power of Creative Arts. "By fostering positive competencies, such as creative expression, strong relationships and leadership abilities, we hope to decrease the juvenile delinquency rate and repeat offenses while supporting the growth and success of Wyoming's youth."

Apply for the Emerging Teaching Artist Fellowship

Applications are open for MindPOP's Emerging Teaching Artist Fellowship. This fellowship aims to increase the number of artists of color and artists with disabilities working in classrooms across Austin, Texas. Successful applicants will come from those communities, have a clear interest in teaching arts to children or adults, and demonstrate a strong creative/arts background. Fellows will receive a $600 stipend upon completion of the program.

Applications are due March 3.

New Blog Post on Equitable Pathways to Opportunities for Young People

The American Youth Policy Forum recently conducted focus groups to gather feedback from young people on creating equitable pathways to opportunities. The discussion focused on access and success in postsecondary education and training that would directly lead to meaningful employment. Participants expressed concern over the gate-keeping that takes place with opportunities for students, particularly for learners from underserved communities.
